DVV Clarification for Criterion 7.1.7

Response

1. The University has not purchased any software for the use of the divyang people. Its website provides access to screen reading software that are in public domain. The University website complies with the world wide web consortium (W3C) web content accessibility guidelines (WCAG) 2.0 level AA. This will enable people with visual impairments access the website using assistive technologies, such as screen readers of which the University provides link on its website. In fact, the information available on the website is accessible with different screen readers as shown below via the screenshot of the University webpage. This is a fantastic technology to assist the blind where text and image contents are rendered as speech or braille output. The corresponding link for screen reading access is provided below the image.
2. There are separate washrooms for divyang people that are equipped with ramp support, handles and convenient height of was-basin and commodes. The image for the same are provided in this document. Human assistance is also provided.
